Lesson 11 Money and Finance

After several failed attempts, the euro zone's finance ministers finally agreed partly to reschedule Greece's debt, and offer several other measures to alleviate the country's financial burden. The promise of relief — and the disbursement of a long-delayed tranche of aid — does not come a moment too soon for Greece, whose economy has been in free-fall for five years.

The second Greek bail-out quickly went off the rails as Greece's economy continued to shrink and its politics became turbulent.

Text 2

The negotiations took place in two phases. First, Greece had to be brought back on a path of deficit-reduction. Big budget cuts worth about 7% of GDP were approved. Second, creditors, led by Germany, had to be convinced to do more to reduce the Greece's debt. This proved to be even more difficult. Even with the latest belt-tightening, Greece was set to miss its target of a sustainable debt-to-GDP ratio.

The solution is to take some measures up-front to demonstrate credibility. The euro zone is crossing the Rubicon: it knows it will have to take losses in order to keep Greece in the club. The reduction in interest rates means that Italy and Spain are lending money to Greece. But they calculate that, in the long run, stabilising the euro zone is in their own interest.
